Obsidian

> stepped Mayan pyramids lay in ruins desolate, unnervingly quiet -thriving cities have become undergrowth, jungle again. fruit trees are bearing bitter fruit this season, orchardists are at a loss. ruins in Central America bear witness to a violent past reminding us that conflict, bitterness and acrimony become convenient weapons serving only unscrupulous invaders that utilise divisive forces to devastate and destroy cultures and lay waste to entire civilisations. a slow steady gait to the top, each stone step counting minutes, years, centuries of pliable time; a climbing procession to the high priests of the Sun. the chill in your demeanour today pure frost ice, an incongruence in this tropical heat.

i remember the jagged obsidian knife, bloodcurdling screams and my pulsing heart in your bloodied hands which you offered to an impartial [Sun] God -a gaping wound, a cavity without a beating heart is all that remained of my life.

oscillating time now finds me offering your heart to that same dispassionate Sun under which countless atrocities have been committed; today only inarticulate stones, remain as mute witnesses to the glory that once was our lives.

i turn my face away from the burning sun to the cool blue [sky] - acrimony and bitterness no longer find a home in this (renewed) warm, beating heart; frost and ice are unable to form or exist here.
