> transposing sound as poetry i have no idea how others write poetry but i hear a sound which becomes or rather, is translated into a poem u think it odd that one sound is able to carry an entire poem?

i could hear feel and sense before my formal 'education' i never gave it a second thought, sound was with me in my mother's womb no light, language or extremes, just wonderful sounds that flowed continually changing, merging and diverging from each other but constant and comforting it flows now even as i write this piece, like a cello but not like a cello, internal sounds are unlike external sounds, fluid environments are more conducive to worlds of sound, literally surround sound external imitations never cut it whatever images i see are shaped by sound the Hindus say that sound is the progenitor of all things sound preceded manifestation well of course it did, sound vibration produces light not the other way around light is vibration and from light all the elements originate every person has a unique sound signature like a finger print we all react to the vibes of another person without a word being spoken and trust the authenticity of those impressions above that of fake social/cultural customs and pleasantries we are able to understand a multitude of diverse sounds simultaneously no effort required and then we learned to do everything the hard way, the inadequate way sound worlds are devoid of conflict, they are modulations of one principle and where there is one, unity wars, dishonesty, conflict cannot exist so i will remain an aural being, pulling poems and secret knowledges from limitless seas of sound
