Desolation

> across the parched land barely visible, a solitary tree survives where no tree should survive its gnarled leafless branches and scarred trunk tell of its plight after the rains all but ceased drawn to its fight to survive i approached, not fully cognisant why until i was in very close proximity -poor desolate tree among dead, fallen trunks, trees that gave up trying as the effort would end in the certainty of death tho this tree would not surrender easily the closer i approached the more it visually spoke to me now before it. it seemed strangely familiar though i was aware that trees like leaves of grass are unique; two lower branches had taken on the appearance of outstretched arms, a knot in its trunk positioned symmetrically above its lower branches questioned why? there was an answer. climate, and the interference of men tho that understanding was beyond man's immediate understanding as if beckoning in desperation i drew closer until i could embrace it, i did not instead i turned, leaned my back against its trunk and outstretched my arms, my head resting in the knot for how long i stood synchronised i do not know tho night had overtaken day and me forgetting to prepare for the night captured by desperation and sheer desolation i saw what no human should be able to see and feel what no human or animal is able to feel my head tilted to the side my diaphragm relaxed i could barely breathe, which heightened the odd sensation drifting into lands that were before the rain ceased teaming with life, grasses and wildflowers in season this tree was ancient and in its patterns it recorded everything from the inception to 'finality,' which i realised had occurred while i assumed the sympathetic connection the next day before the dawn sun appeared i wept spontaneously, the tree and i had something in common we were the last that persevered to the end few are aware that the rabbi was crucified on a tree not a cross, which unusual tree endows man with eternal life after temporal death has overtaken him the galactic fruits of this tree ripen only in spinning vortices of light, and those lights are the living lights of men which never dim or extinguish
