Space

between the centre and circumference of the circle of existence is space it is that space that defines the circle and everything else, as without it there is nothing, no centre or emanating radius and no circumference, therefore no form/circle -space is that necessary something which defines all things now consider that a jar is only useful due to the space it contains as is a house, we live in the space, not the walls, roof or floor and yet space is ignored or at best taken for granted but it fills/saturates the void, its emptiness is vital to existence and so emptiness is the essential component which exalts all things, including man what occurs if we turn our minds to that 'emptiness'? we know that emptiness is something and thoughts are things/formations, structures of the mind, thoughts are not the space in which they form you have noticed that space is consistent, unvarying there is not this or that space, only one space that permeates all existence and so that space has meaning, as it is the substrate that carries every-thing if you wish to find meaning then enter the space between thoughts and you would discover wonder, something truly special and if you hold that for a duration then thought itself subsides leaving only awareness and perfect clarity in which all vexations and problems are solved/dissolve, as space defines everything -- only in that infinite space is true freedom and Perfection found surely it now becomes the height of foolishness to underrate or not address/embrace that unpolluted, continuous perfection?

there is so much more to it than here indicated but you must discover its wonders for yourself
