they glide miles without thinking or effort just above the water where air and sea meet forming a secret current known to the feathered few a gull returning to the cliffs in a storm twitches its wings and body perfectly in almost cyclonic winds to land safely in its nest, a wonder to behold how wild creatures react perfectly to the elements without thought the beauty and harmony of natural existence is unparalleled by anything produced by those that have mastered thought, a price too high to pay for losing direct connection with natural harmony a screaming airliner rips the sky dragged upward by primitive polluting engines, the craft cannot twitch or manoeuvre its body fast enough to save itself when difficulties arise, down they go with all lives lost when they routinely fail yet man governed by thought, thinks himself wonderful in his profound blindness the wind moves the long grasses and whips waves on the sea, which yield and react according to their nature, hissing, murmuring and splashing songs while screaming man forces himself onto a natural world like some blind refugee from the depths of ignorance it is absurd to worship the contorted, cumbersome creations of man, which the smallest living creature puts to shame -- such is the supreme intelligence of thoughtlessness compared to the continual failures of arrogant and inadequate imaginings

"I think therefore I am," is missing the most important qualifier: 'I think therefore I am Lost,' is far more accurate learn harmony and respect from the tribals that have managed to survive the murderous onslaught of 'civilised' men and perhaps you too would discover what you were really meant to Be
